The cerebral vascular endothelial cell lining the brain is distinguished from that lining the other components of the blood-brain barrier by its selective permeability to substances with a molecular weight below 1.2×10^6 . The present study demonstrates that cerebral endothelial cells possess a greater than usual density of cell surface proteins that can be isolated from the plasma membrane of these cells by non-ionic detergent treatment and subsequent affinity chromatography. Proteins associated with the cerebral endothelial plasma membrane, including microtubule-associated proteins, beta-tubulin, and a protein of Mr approximately 66,000 (66K), were found to be similar in overall charge to those which are characteristic of a membrane preparation from the endothelial cells of other non-neural tissues. The cerebral endothelial surface-associated protein 66K appears to be a major constituent of the cell plasma membrane, as demonstrated by its high density and the fact that it is not enriched in the soluble fraction of the plasma membrane preparation. The 66K protein was found to have an isoelectric point of 5.9, a charge of $3.0e^-$ when isolated by anion exchange chromatography, and an apparent molecular weight of 66K by gel filtration on Sephacryl S-300. Unlike other cell types, cerebral endothelial cells incorporate high levels of arachidonic acid into their membrane phospholipids. The presence of a large percentage of low-density lipoproteins in the 66K fraction of cerebral endothelial plasma membranes may be correlated with a preferential uptake of this lipoprotein fraction by brain endothelial cells in vivo, which may result in a decrease in the number of brain capillary endothelial cells, as reported by others.Subject: re : bedc qc1. 02 / 03 - the jelly rolls here is the deal. i basically purchased our paper at
